CONSCRIPT

My feet are tramping to martial music, but my heart is weary

On the one hand, I can join with cowards and traitors and ene-I can stay at home in the companionship of old and sick men, as and Scripture to the devil's purpose. I can insist on rights that will help men destroy my future rights. I can realest war of all times, see my comrades die, behold the of a world changing-and stand apart, because things are other hand, I can join with jingoes and dollar patriots I can scrape off the polish of civilization and go back old forces,-blood and iron. With millions of others I can ng, to swing blazing torches and to lunge bayonets. To ight a beast I can become a beast, with no concern except the mey of my pack and the survival of its traditions.

So I shall go to battle. To rid the world of a great evil, I will and oreat flames of hate. Against the Kaiser and all kings, against mkers and all false representatives of the people, against Beland all slavery, against German injustice and all injusfight. But it is easier to light flames than to put them war against Germany may be over in a few years, but there battles at home against greed and vice and false rulers. heart, I pledge this warfare. When I come back I shall centinue the fight; then let those who forced me to hate beware of WILL LOU.

Hewever, I may not come back.

There is no good reason why we should not announce that the men of the 23rd and 71st Regiments are going to take part in the Community Chorus's Song and Light Festival in Central Park Thursday and Friday evenings. You can't all see our soldiers fight, but you can all hear them sing.

Does it perhaps occur to Morrie that a man doesn't reveal such intimately personal characteristics and feelings except when he senses a full ympathy with them-and then, generally, only at night, after lights are out? Does Morrie know that the more deeply a man feels the more inclined he is to cover it with a laugh? Does Morrie consider that maybe he himself is irreparably handicapped in undertaking to do the very thing he must do in order to establish his premise-namely judge men as they are and not as they seem?

Fate may be kind, after all, to No. 33's famous bronze doors.

There is still a chance that the massive panels of bronze, which at one time guarded the entrance to the wine cellar in a haughty Doge's Venetian palace, and more recently swung wide to admit the élite and clanged noisily shut against the undesirables at one of New York's most gilded gambling halls.

Bronze doors on which the duty alone had been $1.600. They had been purchased in Italy, and there was authentic proof of their antiquity, dating back to the Doge's Venetian palace.

Then one day District Attorney Jerome slipped through the bronze doors, and the next day Gottfried Wall-baum, who had been sole owner and proprietor of "The House with the Bronze Doors," closed them for good and all on a gambling nouse.
